The Child I Wished to Have So Badly is Driving Me Crazy

The sibling book

CONTENT

The Child I Wished to Have So Badly gets Reinforcements

Siblings fight with each other, they love each other, they want attention - and bring wrinkles of concern to their parents' brows. As usual, these best-selling authors turn their attention to a topic that many of their readers have requested: how parents can be fair to each of their offspring. They describe how parents with multiple children can open up the free spaces necessary to be able to get to know each of their children individually. The focus is on the family bond, but the authors also shed light on why the sibling relationship provides us with important opportunities in testing what constitutes successful social behaviour. This results from the fact that within the sibling relationship, apart from arguments, there is a large amount of love and trust. Danielle Graf and Katja Seide describe what parents can do to make sure that each child feels visible in the family without them losing sight of themselves in the chaos of everyday life.

Boys & Puberty

Staying in touch when everything changes

CONTENT

Closed for reconstruction

The journey from boyhood to manhood is not an easy one and it's hard for parents too. It's almost too late to rely on upbringing – but what else is there? The most important thing for parents to do is maintain the relationship with their almost grown-up son and recalibrate it. Germany's best-known expert on boys' issues shows how best to get the right balance between holding on and letting go using many examples and tips. Reinhard Winter helps parents experience their son's puberty as a dynamic phase of life itself: making itself felt on all levels of life - physically, psychologically and socially - but ultimately it gives the adolescent boy (and his parents) the strength to manage the growing up process.

How Much Mother Does a Child Need?

A book about bonding, upbringing and care in the first years of life

CONTENT

Findings from attachment research which help to quell the fears parents have

'How Much Mother Does a Child Need' is a question which concerns most families. Thrown back into the confines of their own four walls thanks to the home office, it has become as clear as day that some rethinking about the roles and tasks in the family and beyond needs to be done. Is mother really responsible for everything that has to do with the children? Or have we not finally reached the point where we should start taking seriously the age-old idea of sharing the enormous efforts involved in childcare? And what about child development, which is so rapid particularly in the first years of life and crucial for the rest of the child's life? What do we know about the child's awakening mental processes and early education? What influence does care have on it?

The attachment researcher Lieselotte Ahnert provides an in depth look at precisely these and many other questions in the first years of a child's life, and in particular includes the child's perspective. The book provides support for parents who are looking to reorientate how they live together with their children. But it also has a lot of information on child psychology for all those who are involved in attachment, education and care of children in the first years of their lives.

- Excellent, well-known book in a completely revised and expanded new edition
- The author is a well-known attachment researcher
- Central questions are thoroughly examined

AUTHOR

Professor Lieselotte Ahnert is an internationally renowned attachment researcher. For almost 40 years she has been doing research on children's early intellectual and social development and on how care conditions affect them. In the early 1980s, she was already carrying out investigations on nurseries in East Germany; this she later continued in the USA and Austria and her work subsequently shaped the quality standards for public childcare services.

Mona Kino

Time for Empathy

Five ways of achieving inner balance and a relaxed coexistence in the family

CONTENT

'We learn empathy the same way we learn a language – use it or lose it!' Jesper Juul

Germany's children are under stress and so are their parents. What is the reason for that and what can parents do about it? For Mona Kino, the answer is empathy: inner balance is a result of empathy, for yourself and for others. Only those who are in tune with themselves and who listen to their own needs can be open to others. The good news: empathy can be encouraged. Many examples, based on scientific studies and personal experience, can inspire parents to enhance relaxation, creativity and dialogue within the family.

This book was written in collaboration with the family therapists Jesper Juul and Helle Jensen and the writer, teacher and dancer Peter Høeg. Exercises to encourage resilience, mindfulness and the zest for life in the family are fun and easy to do: in everyday life, at the traffic lights or for 5 minutes under a tree in the park.

- Based on interviews with Jesper Juul and Peter Høeg
- Exercises to encourage resilience, mindfulness and the zest for life in the family

Mona Kino studied under Jesper Juul to become a family consultant and empathy trainer. She is part of the Danish empathy movement which arose from the work of Juul, Helle Jensen and the writer Peter Høeg. She lives with her two children and her husband in Berlin.

Get Out of the Mental Load Trap

How to achieve a fair division of work within the family

CONTENT

Thinking about it is also on the to-do list

In most cases, women take on the role of family manager. Whether they want to or not. They think of everything, plan the daily life, keep in mind every little to-do list for the children and their partners. This kind of project management is a recognised and well-paid full-time job in business, but at home it is work which somehow just magically 'gets done'.

Mental load is the expression for what puts women under endless stress. In her new book, Patricia Cammarata demonstrates some concrete ways out of this situation, for women and for men, which she has tried out herself and in her workshops: sharing out responsibilities fairly, letting go of some tasks, creating free space and, above all, applying energy to be there for each other as a couple - this will solve the problem in the long term. A book for mothers and fathers who finally want to live on an equal footing.
